After that, the full version can be.Q: Logic Application Architecture I'm having a hard time conceptualizing the application architecture of a logic application (software). For instance, I have a product that uses a network of interconnected devices - the output of one device is the input for the next - a continuous string of data is transferred between devices. There are two components involved here, one is a database (SQL Server) and the other is a web server (IIS) and associated application (C#). The database stores data and the web server serves up web pages to the end user. After a while, there is one specific string of data that needs to be posted to the web server, so we have a special function. The web server stores the request as a string in the Database and then gets the special function to perform the desired task. The
